Hampton, VA – The Hampton History Museum welcomes October and the Halloween season with “The Witching of the Virginia Midwife,” a talk on how midwives have been demonized by historian D’Anne Graham, on Monday, October 3. Additionally, the always entertaining M.S.G. Acoustic Blues Trio performs their first in-person concert as part of the museum’s Front Porch Music Series on Wednesday, October 19.

After an absence of several years, the museum’s reanimated “Hampton Horror Tours” hit the streets with stories of mystery and the macabre for two tours nightly from October 25-30. These frightfully fun walking tours are a fundraiser for the museum.

Join historian D’Anne Graham for this fascinating exploration about the changing status of the Virginia midwife. Was she a witch? Pillar of the community? Agent of the state? Wise woman or uneducated killer of mothers and babies?

D’Anne Graham is an independent scholar of women’s health and medicine history. In the late 1990s, she was an early leader in the grassroots effort to decriminalize midwifery in Virginia through community organizing and policy work. Returning to finish her degree in 2005 and 2009, she was one of the first recipients of the Virginia Commonwealth University Undergraduate Fellowship Award when she began historicizing Virginia midwifery.

Graham is a recent Virginia Humanities Fellow researching the archives at the Library of Virginia for her forthcoming book A Parcel of Murdering Bitches: Childbirth and Women’s Autonomy from the Original Colony to the #MeToo Movement, charting the history of birth and midwifery from Colonial Virginia to the current debates on childbirth, consent, bodily autonomy (#MeToo) and licensure. The Virginia experience reflects the larger themes of American women’s childbirth experience—state control and surveillance of the female body; the usurpation of women’s authority in the birth chamber by the rise of male-dominated medicine as a profession; and the influence of race and class on everything from the status of midwives to the control of racial categories on birth records under eugenics.

She holds a BA in religious studies with a minor in history from Virginia Commonwealth University and a Master of Arts in Health Advocacy from Sarah Lawrence College.

The fate of midwife Joan Wright, accused of witchcraft in September 1626, is portrayed in the Hampton History Museum's Hampton Horror Tours taking place October 25-30 (more below).

Can you help us out of our "dry spell"?

We're working on an exhibit exploring alcohol production, prohibition and the temperance movement in Hampton and Phoebus from the late 1800s-1930s. We need your help in finding artifacts, just a few, to interpret this fascinating period of our past: bar signs, alcohol production equipment (could be agricultural as well), personal articles related to the subject, anti or pro alcohol items, and other things with a Hampton provenance directly related to the subject.

Your artifact may be in the exhibit. We need just a few iconic items, and your help in locating them would be greatly appreciated! Please email contact information, description and any photos of the artifact to history@hampton.gov.
